arrival of rails for the track on the South Side. Had the rails arrived when the company expected, the track would have been completed before this, excepting over the new bridge.

The rail used on the new track is different from the rails formerly used by the company. It is laid on the ties, without stringers, and has a wide flange just like the ordinary street rail. Two car loads of rails and some special shapes for curves and the like are yet to come. It is thought the straight rails will be here to-day. The company will put in a peculiar switch arrangement on the wires at Tenth and Main streets.

The basement will be 9 feet in the clear and only about 3 feet will be below the level of the ground, it not being deemed advisable to go lower for the reason that trouble might be had from possible floods in the future. There will be but very little ornamentation about the building, but at the same time the graceful outlines and substantial appearance of the structure will make it an ornament to that portion of the city. Rising in the center of the front there will be a circular tower extending above
